The Light Risen in Darkness: In Four Parts; Being a Collection of Letters Written to Several, Vol. 1 of 4 (Classic Reprint) Antoinette Bourignon

To the English Reader. In the first part we are groping in the dark as much as before; if we are brought forth by the fruits which we daily see to be brought forth. By which it is evident, that after all the learning which is broke out within these two last centuries, the great cultivation of human reason, and all the fruitless pretences to a greater light acknowledged, there were never on the surface of the mines of spiritual darkness, done there as at this very time, and in their nations particularly which boast highly of the reformation. Never was a theism, deism and sadducism at a greater height, or even at so great a distance that it may truly be called a gloom day, both upon this and other considerations; even a day of clouds and of thick darkness. The prophet feel hath said, such as hath not been ever the like. For by the sophistry of carnal reason, and the vain philosophy and learning of the age, which are seated in the chair of Christ and of his apostles, the light of divine truth is become darkened, and many souls are fallen from heaven, being the lights of the church and the powers of heaven, which are the spiritual guides and pastors, are shaken. Wherefore also the temporal state of the church, expressed according to our authors interpretation by the illumination, must be turned into blood and cease to give its light, by the means of the woeful confusions and divisions of its parties, which will inevitably be dashed one against another, and break all these to pieces, who will not give heed now in this their day to the things that make for the peace of the church nor attend to the coming forth of the day-spring from on high as lightning out of the east; by watching unto the clear manifestation of his fore-running light, which shineth as in a park place, and may be compared to the morning-red which
