The past few years have seen a tremendous surge of interest in the biology of mitochondria, partly with the re-emergence of metabolism as a focus of topical interest as well as fundamental importance, and partly through the changing perception of their cell biology, and their recognition as a regulated dynamic network engaging with the other membrane systems of the cell, transmitting and receiving signals on its metabolic status, and serving as a launching-pad for programmed cell death. Reflecting this explosion of new interest and changing perspective, this book launches a cross-journal series of commissioned articles and research papers that cover every aspect of mitochondrial biology, from the still-contentious origins of this ancient organelle to the current understanding of its activities as a metabolic and signalling hub.
